GEA School

The GEA (Ecological and Environmental Justice) School in Trevignano Romano consisted of three days of intensive formative activities on ecology, activism, and environmental protection at the local level. Conferences, group projects and activities immersed in nature were part of this school, an experience I shared with about 70 other involved citizens and young activists. Notably among the speakers and participants, Maxima Acuna, recipient of the 2016 Goldman Environmental Prize, was with us in Trevignano for the three days, making the event even more meaningful.

It was aimed at students and researchers from different disciplines who sought to advance their knowledge and share good practices for the analysis of climate change critical theories, narrations and discourse. It provided theoretical and methodological tools for the identification of linguistic, discursive, narrative and multimodal strategies in dialogue with related studies in the humanities and social sciences. The programme (see link below) consisted of a series of lectures, intensive work sessions and roundtable discussions.
